Pittsburg admirers of Robert Burns are to erect a monument to his honor in Schenley park in that city, according to the current issue of The Monumental News. Unlike the superb memorial of Barre granite which adorns the grounds at Spaulding school, the Smoky City monument is to be of bronze, although The News states that it is to be entirely worthy of the great Scottish bard. The statue is being completed by J. Massey Rhind and the funds are supplied by persons living in Pittsburg. It is to be cast and placed in 1914 on a desirable site selected by the city's art commission. The sculptor found his theme in the "Ode to a Mountain Daisy" and the first line of the little poem is to be inscribed on the plinth. The sculptor is to represent Burns as standing in front of his plough, holding in his hand the "wee, modest, crimson-tipped flow" which he has just turned down with the plow. As the model appears, Burns is looking at the daisy meditatively and somewhat regretfully, although, as The News adds, "the sculptor has sought to avoid the entirely sentimental mood in which most statues of Burns are plunged and to indicate in the little and mainly figure the virile outer of 'A Man's Man for a' That' and 'Scottie' and 'Wha Hae'." The statue, measuring eight feet and six inches without the plinth, is to stand on a pink granite pedestal, retary.
